

Ignition interlock policies reduce alcohol-impaired driving

Currently, 28 states require ignition interlocks in vehicles for people who have been convicted of impaired driving. Ignition interlocks prevent people from driving with a blood alcohol content (BAC) level above a set threshold, which helps lower re-arrest rates for alcohol-impaired driving. Studies show that installing ignition interlocks can help decrease re-arrest rates by nearly 70%.¹